There aren't many books about the exotic-seeming sailboats of sea-faring peoples. There aren't any on how their methods might help the average backyard boater. Third World boat designs have evolved over the millennia to be easy and cheap to build and to repair, and to keep family sailors safe and to provide them with reliable livelihoods. This is in contrast to Western boat traditions, many of which come to us by way of luxury and profiteering, where most boats are expensive, difficult to build, and require crews, which are often considered expendable! Author Richard Carsen is 83 years old and has voyaged the globe for many years. He writes about his experiences with indigenous boats, small boat-building and unusual rigs in the magazine "Messing About in Boats." This book is a compilation of his columns.
